

Do you want to pay to use the internet in the future?

(After Wi-Fi costs)

In the United States of America, the government is currently passing a law so that people have to pay a monthly fee to use certain websites such as Facebook, Instagram and YouTube. This means that the strength of your internet connection is proportional to the amount of money you pay, regardless of your provider. The current law that is already in place is called Net Neutrality: a law that is preventing Americans from having to pay to use the internet. Before long, this law will be replaced with this abysmal one.

Could this be introduced to England, and is this law a reasonable decision for America and American families, regardless of their financial background? Approximately 70% of Americans do not want this law to go through, so why is this happening regardless of what the people say?

A branch of the government called the Federal Communications Committee (FCC) oversees the laws concerning the internet. They decide whether this law will go through or not, and the public cannot do anything about it. People are now starting to sign a petition to hold back this unjust law.

One reason is because Americans do not want to pay to use the internet, can you blame them?

FCC chairman Ajit Pai has become a hated figure in America. Not only has he taken away free internet from Americans, he has made multiple videos, many of which are intentionally cheesy. These videos are used to rub salt in the wounds of Americans.

FCC Chairman Ajit Pai in his Christmas video.

On December 14th, 2018 the new law will officially replace the old one, unless there is enough backlash from people not just in America, but around the entire world.

Get your mouse ready and start firing off emails. The resistance is coming!

By: Dominik, Martin, Marek and Rogger